The primary goal of the course is to familiarize participants with surgical approaches used to treat pathological conditions of the head and neck. Through this course, students build on their understanding of basic gross anatomy to gain a better appreciation of the complex anatomy of the head and neck.

Anatomy is the basic science of all surgery. Surgery in the region of the head and neck cannot be considered safe unless the surgeon thoroughly understands the anatomy of this.

Head and neck cancers usually spread to adjacent lymph nodes in a diagonal direction from cephalad to caudad. There is a large degree of variability in drainage pathways, but the anatomic location of individual lymph nodes is more consistent from patient to patient. "This volume has been made up from those sections of Dr. Deaver's complete work on 'Surgical anatomy' which treat specially of the regions which are of greatest interest to those practitioners who confine their work to diseases of the eye, ear, nose, mouth, throat and nervous system."- Pages: The fascial planes of the head and neck and the facial nerve. A peculiar feature of the anatomy of the head and neck is the concentric arrangement of the facial soft tissues in layers.
